DANO MIGHT

As a member of the delightfully dysfunctional family in Little Miss Sunshine, Paul Dano hardly said a word, his character having taken a vow of silence for most of the movie. In Dano's new film, There Will Be Blood, the highly anticipated period epic from director Paul Thomas Anderson, Dano spouts feverishly from the pulpit as an evangelical preacher in turn-of-the-century Texas who clashes with Daniel Day-Lewis' hellbent oilman. Both performances are stirring Oscar talk, but Dano is still recovering from his trip to the last Oscars as part of the cast of Sunshine, nominated for Best Picture. "'Surreal' is a good word," says the humble and soft-spoken Dano, 23, in describing the experience. "I felt like I was doing something wrong, being there. But it was actually a lot of fun. It was definitely a blur." There Will Be Blood reunited Dano with Day-Lewis, with whom he'd worked in The Ballad of Jack and Rose. "Being a fairly young man and having had a chance to look up to Daniel's work before I got to work with him, the most special thing to me was just getting to know him and getting to be friends with him," Dano says.

As a teen growing up in Connecticut, Dano (pronounced Day-no) steadily progressed from school plays to public and regional theater to a lead role in the controversial indie L.I.E.; currently the East Village resident and literature major at NYC's The New School (he's got a few semesters to go) is performing in the off-Broadway play Things We Want, directed by Ethan Hawke, through December. And although his filmography consists mainly of serious, low-budget dramas like The King, Fast Food Nation and the yet-to-be-released teen violence tale Weapons, Dano says, "The one thing I'm trying to learn is to really just be open to anything. Dumb and Dumber is one of my favorite films, just as much as a Robert Bresson film."—Andre Chautard
